More Cities Adopt Social Districts

Two Wake County towns are the newest to consider creating social districts in their downtown areas for the public consumption of alcohol.

Fuquay-Varina and Wake Forest announced the proposed districts Friday. They would let people buy alcohol to go in participating businesses and drink it while walking through the designated zone.

State law otherwise forbids drinking on public sidewalks and streets.

On October 17, the Durham City Council voted unanimously for an open-container-friendly downtown district starting in December. Downtown Durham Inc., an economic nonprofit for the city, has been working since March to get the ordinance passed.

The vote came two months after the Raleigh City Council officially launched its social district in August with more than 70 participating businesses downtown. Greensboro, Kannapolis and Monroe have also launched districts.

Charlotte-Meck Schools to Follow Law in 2023

Leaders of Charlotte-Mecklenburg Schools are backing down from talk of defying the state's controversial school calendar law this year.

The district is currently polling the community on two options for the 2023-24 school calendar. Both of them bring students back on Aug. 28, as required by the state's school calendar law.

Normally that would be no surprise. But when schools opened this year, Interim Superintendent Hugh Hattabaugh told reporters the school board had instructed him to look at following the Central Piedmont Community College calendar, which starts Aug. 14, for the coming year.

Hattabaugh noted that the decision would fall to the board. Chair Elyse Dashew, who was in the audience at the news conference, didn't contradict him. She had recently tweeted her support for the Gaston County school board's decision approving an Aug. 17 start date that defied the state law.

Charles Jeter, director of policy and government affairs for the CMS board, now says any move to synchronize with the Central Piedmont calendar would likely come no earlier than 2024.

Gaston, Cleveland and Rutherford counties opened early this year, despite a state calendar law driven largely by the tourism industry that requires a late-August opening for most districts. In September the Cabarrus County school board voted to join them in August 2023.

The current law does not specify penalties for disregarding the mandate, and many legislators of both parties have called for giving districts flexibility.

(NCTIA lobbyists are in talks with legislators interested in putting legal accountability in the 2004 summer calendar law.)
